By pursuing opportunities available to me during my studies, like being a part of Welcome Place, holding research positions and taking a leadership role on committees, I was able to build meaningful relationships and make an impact with faculty, my fellow students and the greater community.

Madison Pearlman saw a way to bring what she learned in the classroom into the community. Passionate about human rights and migration law, she used the connections she made with U of M faculty and partnered with local agency Welcome Place to establish a work placement opportunity for Robson Hall students to work with families new to Canada.

Nicole Luke is excited about the future of Indigenous design. Inspired by her fellow students and professors in the Faculty of Architecture community, she wants to make her own mark with a career that embraces her Inuit roots. Yellowknife-born and Winnipeg-raised, she calls herself an urban Inuk, and hopes to bring her environmental design education to the North through improved housing and the creation of sacred spaces.

“My experience at the U of M has made me think critically about an urban culture versus an Indigenous culture, and how the two may seem contradictory but yet are not…. I would like to design a type of architecture that complements the Arctic and its people.”
